

Gbenga Emmanuel Afolayan is currently a doctoral candidate at School of Education, Murdoch University Australia. He holds two master's degrees. The first, a Masters in Development Studies, from International Institute of Social Studies of Erasmus University Rotterdam, the Netherlands and the second is a Masters in Public Policy and Management, from University of York, UK. Also, Gbenga had a bachelor degree of Education in Counselling Psychology and Economics from University of Ibadan, Nigeria. Gbenga's research interests fall in the areas of education and social inequalities, development policies and administration, sociology of education/development, women studies, feminist economics, human rights and social justice. He taught Economics and Business Management for more than five years at the Federal Polytechnic Ilaro, Ogun State, Nigeria. He has participated in several national and international conferences where development issues that are relevant to the socio-economic situations of the developing world are discussed. He is presently co-editing a Handbook of Research on Global Perspectives on Development Administration and Cultural Change with Dr Akeem Ayofe Akinwale (University of Lagos, Nigeria). His current work revolves around female education, early child marriage and girl-focused development programs in West Africa and South Asia.